20th Century Gals

This documentary focuses on four areas where women's progress in the 19th Century was most dramatic: POLITICS, SEXUALITY, WORK and FAMILY. Babe (the 1940s gal reporter, created by Cathy Jones of This Hour Has 22 Minutes) is our tour guide and narrator through the 20th Century, in a mix of historical re-enactments, clips from personal writings, first-hand testimonials, archival records and radio and TV news clips. Babe provides the journalistic glue in her 1940s no-nonsense, tongue-in-cheek style. Shot in period sets at the Canadian Museum of Civilization and specially reconstructed 1940s news room "20th Century Gals" both educates and entertains – painlessly

The Great March

1874... the North-West Mounted Police were Canada's only hope to tame the wild frontier at the heart of its dream of nationhood. Their toughest opponents were not just American outlaws and whiskey traders... but the resistance of the land itself. "The Great March" recreates this spectacular adventure, depicting the perils and hardships faced by the newly minted "Mounties". Resplendent in their majestic red serge, the men are unprepared for what awaits them. They confront terrifying prairie storms, starvation, thirst, dysentery, malaria, death of their horses, and the constant pervasive fear of battles with the whiskey traders and the prairies Indians. Based upon original diaries, journals and illustrations recorded by members of the expeditionary force of 1874.

Oscar Peterson: Keeping the Groove Alive

Perfectionist, practical joker, and one of the all-time greatest exponents of jazz, the late Oscar Peterson was unlike any music legend that ever was or ever will be. Dubbed the “Maharajah of Piano” by Duke Ellington, his utter dedication to music for over seven decades took him to the pinnacle of international success and to the depths of emotional despair.

Oscar Peterson: Keeping the Groove Alive reveals the man behind the legend, featuring compelling interviews with Diana Krall, Herbie Hancock, Phil Nimmons and many more.
